Medium Quality "VR" Games Studio Studio - The Take review The Take is a great game for people who have never played a VR game before. For people already used to VR, this may be a little too intense. The Take is an innovative game which plays out like an escape the room, but with lots of new challenges. There's multiple challenges, and over 20 puzzles, so the game can seem overwhelming at times. But you only have to play a few times before you figure out the best strategy for each puzzle, and that can speed up the game quite a bit. When you start playing The Take, you're presented with two windows. One is for the main game play, and the other is a "Welcome to VR" window. The game you play in the main window can be played in 180° or 360°, and a game in the VR window can only be played in 90°. After trying out the main game, you're guided through an introduction to the basic mechanics of the game. You first pick up a game controller with the name "Seeker" on it. This is an active game controller with some sensors on it. You also get to choose between an "Explorer" controller and a "Sneaker" controller. The backpack that comes with the Explorer is a bit roomy, and the Sneaker is a bit less roomy, so it's a good choice for people with big hands. You can also select from between different worlds, starting with "World 1" and working your way up. You get to play 2 to 3 levels of the main game in the main window, and up to 3 levels of the VR game in the VR window. You get to pick a world that you like, and then you explore and solve puzzles. You have a small world to explore, and most of the puzzles are simple, with a few more challenging ones mixed in. You have to get a little deeper into the puzzles to see how to solve them, but the solutions are relatively straightforward. You have a button on the controller that you press to interact with a puzzle. You have to figure out if there's a hint in the instruction for that puzzle. In the VR window, you get to explore more of the entire world. You can move around and look around. You can even walk around the edge of the room to get a different view of the room. But things in the VR world are a bit limited
